

The mother of the most charming children I know said, "I give in to the children whenever I possibly can. I think it strengthens their characters to know that they influence me. It gives them confidence. Think how bleak the world would be to them, how despairingly immovable, if they could not win me to their way. I think it teaches them, too, that one may give in and still be charming."

It makes little difference if you throw bouquets or stones—it is always well to hold a supply in reserve. Additional bouquets will be expected, and more stones will be needed.
